The 2014 decision by Prime Minister Shinzo Abe’s government to reinterpret Article 9 of the Japanese Constitution and pass security legislation accordingly has been (and continues to be) a source of major controversy in Japanese society and academia. While much of the debate has centered around constitutional issues and democratic political ideals, a key issue is the right of collective self-defense -- a concept of public international law. This lecture will evaluate the content of the 2015 security legislation and its implications from the perspective of international law and international relations.

The Judicial Studies Programme (JSP) organises capacity-building workshops, seminars and other forums where judges can discuss problems facing Judiciaries today (especially in the Asia Pacific) and exchange views on how those problems might best be resolved in a cost-effective and timely manner and in the interests of justice. The JSP also organises public lectures (such as under the Young Scholars Series) on topics relating to the work of judges, lawyers and legal topics of current interest. The first and second lectures under the Young Scholars Series were delivered in 2015 by Lukas Rass-Masson of Université Paris II on “Establishing Civil Jurisdiction in the European Union and at Common Law” and Nobumichi Teramura of the University of New South Wales on “Indirect Grounds of Jurisdiction: A Comparison between Hong Kong and Japanese Law” respectively.

Masatoshi Takeuchi has written extensively in Japanese and English on public international law issues. In addition to teaching at Chuo University, he lectures at Takasaki City University of Economics (Gumma Prefecture), Musashi University (Tokyo) and Tamagawa University (Tokyo).
