Today indigenous peoples are making requests to museums for the return of their ancestors’ human remains. Ancient indigenous human remains have a sui generis quality and as such their status in international law is unclear. Consequently this makes them vulnerable to retention by museums. This presentation focuses on the status of indigenous human remains from a legal perspective critiquing property, cultural property, cultural heritage, intellectual property, Traditional Knowledge (TK) and a human rights based approach. On analyses ancient indigenous human remains are not explicitly protected in international law. However in conclusion, adopting a jurisprudential and legal instrument Toolkit approach, drawing on the former legal frameworks, emphasises the potential value of the fragmentation of international law in the legal protection of ancient indigenous human remains.

Dr Fiona Batt has a LLB, LLM and PhD from the UK. Fiona Batt has lectured in law in the UK and the Gambia. Fiona Batt was formerly Acting Dean at the University of the Gambia Law Faculty.
